On [REDACTED] for the first time in several months, only a cursory customs inspection was made by Yugoslav border guards at the Sesana stop-over of the Orient Express as it entered the Free Territory of Trieste from Yugoslavia. In the past, this train was often retarded as much as three hours by the customs officials and border guards who meticulously searched passengers and the train itself. A Yugoslav officer was asked why a detailed search was not being made, and he replied that orders had been received no longer to cause any inconvenience to passengers entering the Free Territory.
